Still, there were other bootleggers like insurance groups who felt the bill was not in their best interest. These interests ran a blitzkrieg of negative ads, heaping much attention on the considerable increase in costs the bill would engender. This issue became a major sticking point during a series of town hall meetings conducted by proponents of the bill, as private citizens became nervous about what the bill would ultimately mean. As a consequence, proponents of reform let once-requisite features of the bill fall by the wayside in deference to this bootlegger opposition. (Public option, anyone?)
