We have had a very, very, lucky escape. I maintained all along that had they won, they would have ensured through more voting gerrymandering, further restrictions on free speech (blasphemy laws making it impossible to criticise a certain protected ideology) and any other means that we would never again had a Conservative government.

David Cameron is wisely using his first 100 days to tackle the biggest challenge of this parliament head on: the EU referendum. This morning's papers report that a new referendum bill will be a core part of next week's Queen's Speech and Cameron is keen to accelerate the vote to 2016. The logic behind this is sound: by seizing on his fresh democratic mandate, Cameron can hope to convince Brussels he is serious about achieving substantive reforms and his Cabinet now includes those who would definitely consider voting Out (Philip Hammond, Boris Johnson, Sajid Javid). If they decline to play ball, then it's goodbye to Blighty.

In this case, given the politically charged climate of the NFL, much for Goodell hinges on risking the support of Kraft. But that can't influence how the commish rules, or he'll really be cooked. As good as Kraft has been for Goodell, there are still owners of 31 other teams to consider. Like so many others, they will be watching to see how he handles it.
